Preservation team at Emory’s Library ready for emergencies

Ready for any emergency, Emory’s Preservation team is available to help during floods, fires, and even local disasters like the one in March that threatened the university’s books, collections, and other materials. The team is part of a coordinated effort among local institutions.

The team is ready for any disaster or emergency that threatens the university’s books, collections, and other materials. The team is part of a coordinated effort among local institutions.

The preservation team is one of the first in a library in the Southeast. The team is trained in using respirators and protective gear for mold removal.

Preservation team members are specialists in mold, water damage, and pest management. They regularly attend seminars and are trained in using respirators and protective gear for mold removal. The preservation team is one of the first in a library in the Southeast.

Read more about their experiences and their preparation for saving valuable materials.